Studies have shown that dendritic cells (DCs) play important roles in the development and regulation of humoral and cellular immunity. B cells are professional antigen presenting cells (APCs), which express both MHC and co-stimulatory molecules. B cell receptor (BCR) engagement by antigen induces B cells to secrete a large number of cytokines and trigger innate and adaptive immunity. DCs also have a prominent role in generating antigen-specific immune responses and BCR engagement may also induce DCs to secrete cytokines. In this study, using the soluble BCR protein mimicking a pathogenic antibody, we investigated the effect of BCR protein on the maturation and function of DCs. We found that maturation of immature DCs is induced by soluble BCR protein and the addition of BCR protein in culture prolongs the survival of immature DCs. In addition, BCR protein induces DCs to secrete high levels of IL-10 and promotes the expression of MHC and co-stimulatory molecules, however, DCs do not express co-stimulatory molecules when stimulated by BCR protein alone. Our data suggest that BCR protein has the ability to induce maturation of DCs by a mechanism different from antigen-specific T cell activation. By now, it is well established that Democrats have a natural advantage in primary elections. Even in areas where they have a terrible record, they can usually win by running aggressively enough to turn out an overwhelming number of their more enthusiastic supporters to overwhelm the opposition. It is the ultimate blood sport, and it gives Democrats a great deal of pleasure to help put out the opposition. For Republicans who are worried that their opponents are not
