Formation of a uniform bony mass around polyvinyl alcohol-expanded polytetrafluoroethylene sheets for osteogenesis. Polytetrafluoroethylene sheets expand in an aqueous solution of polyvinyl alcohol and are useful for bone generation. However, the resulting mass has a rough surface that may be associated with complications. This study aimed to modify the surface of the polytetrafluoroethylene sheet for promoting the formation of osteoid tissue. The ends of the polytetrafluoroethylene sheets were surface treated with four different materials, and the osteogenesis of rat calvarial defect was evaluated. The experimental procedure was divided into four groups: the polytetrafluoroethylene sheets and the polytetrafluoroethylene sheets with the following: the surface of the polytetrafluoroethylene sheet with plasma treatment (P group); the surface of the polytetrafluoroethylene sheet with calcium sulfate coating (S group); the surface of the polytetrafluoroethylene sheet with freeze-dried bone powder coating (C group); and the surface of the polytetrafluoroethylene sheet with 09e8f5149f
