After some more googling Cadets and junior leadership training Cadets and junior leadership training, also referred to as "CJLT", is an informal examination system used within Royal Military Academy Sandhurst (RMAS) in the United Kingdom to determine the suitability of candidates for entry as a commissioned officer into the Royal Military Academy Sandhurst Cadet Corps. The system is used to break up the cadets into smaller groups or "squads" of no more than 40 cadets, or "pairs" of no more than 20 cadets, to provide training on "what makes a cadet a cadet", and to provide the cadets with social interaction. Other reasons for the examination system are to ensure that all cadets are doing the same activities and are at the same stage of training, as well as to promote cadet morale, retention, and teamwork. Overview The idea of the examination system at RMAS was used at the Royal Military Academy Sandhurst as a way of giving the cadets a way to compete against each other, but also as a way of bringing them closer, as well as providing them with the opportunity to make friends. At RMAS, the system is used to break up the cadets into smaller groups or "squads" of no more than 40 cadets, or "pairs" of no more than 20 cadets, to provide training on "what makes a cadet a cadet", and to provide the cadets with social interaction. Other reasons for the examination system are to ensure that all cadets are doing the same activities and are at the same stage of training, as well as to promote cadet morale, retention, and teamwork. The theory behind the examination system is that the more competitive the cadets are in their "squad", the better they will be able to get along with each other and the more they will learn. The smaller the "squad" the better.
