"Played many of the fantasy games before hand; some were amazing, I'll admit. Some were good, too, but in my opinion, most of them fail in the game design. You know what I mean, right? When you play, the game instantly drops you into an area, some map like, and says "go from here." After that, you are on your own. The only way to go, to get anywhere, is by following some random assortment of streets and roads. It's completely unstructured, which is terrible. The game never tells you how to go. It allows you to do things on your own, which is great, but it doesn't tell you which roads to take, which turns to take, or what to do when you get there. You're just left to fill in the gaps. I've played lots of different RPGs before. I've never heard of an RPG that lacks structure before. It's not that I don't know how to play RPGs, I just have never encountered a game that didn't have a starting point and a set of objective markers guiding you throughout the game world, keeping you on track. Hell, you don't even need a map. You are free to explore as you want, but if you want to get anywhere, you should be able to. The whole idea of a map is that you don't have to know where to go. You are just free to go where you want and explore as you wish. That's how RPGs should work. The story is also terrible. I just don't like reading poorly done and poorly written stories. I cannot lie when I say that the sound of the Elvarg and the female voice acting of Valkyrie are the worst ones I have ever heard. The game's basic features are clear: look at the screen, wait until something happens, then trigger the "story" to progress. "The end is here" is the most basic of triggers. I just don't like it. Ever. The presentation is very good. The art looks great. The music feels appropriate. The combat works very well. All I'm talking about is the story itself. I have a lot to say about the story, but it doesn't really matter, because I can bff6bb2d33
