Field of the invention The present invention relates to a method and device for detecting low level (5% or less) leakage currents of a power switch. More particularly, this invention relates to an electronic circuit for detecting low level leakage currents of power switches, and a method of detecting such leakage currents using this circuit. 2. Description of the Related Art Generally, power switches are electric power switches for controlling power flow in a power supply circuit. Power switches may be implemented in an integrated circuit (IC) package and embedded in printed circuit boards or mechanical switches are often used to control power. For example, power switches are often used in lighting circuits, such as in the dimmer circuits of dimmer switches. These dimmer circuits are typically composed of electronic switches that include bucking circuits to receive electrical power and switch it to the load. A typical dimmer circuit has a series connection of a diac that controls the flow of power to a load and a Zener diode that ensures the Zener diode is always in a non-conducting state. Another type of electronic switch is a triac. A triac is a special type of power switch that is used in lighting applications. Triacs are typically implemented as dual gate structures with the gate control of the one gate wired to a first node and the gate control of the other gate wired to a second node. Current flows through the structure to the load via a parallel connection of the cathode and anode, bypassing the gated junction. One advantage to the triac is that the gate control may be electrically isolated from the load and thus, essentially, any load may be coupled to the gate controls. Current leakage paths through these electronic switches can cause undesirable heating of the load. The current leakage through the diac and the triac can be easily seen by connecting a voltmeter across the load and the control node of the diac or triac. However, current leakage through the series switch cannot easily be determined without the use of specialized electronic equipment. One type

The only example I've found online, shows it using either a DataTable or an ObservableCollection. I'm more familiar with the DataGrid control. I tried it using a DataView but it just doesn't have enough features for me to grasp. I can't seem to find anything online that shows how to do this.
