Effects of potential endocrine-disrupting chemicals on oestradiol synthesis and cytochrome P450 1A activity in European eel (Anguilla anguilla). The accumulation of the polychlorinated biphenyl (PCB) mixture, Aroclor 1016 (Acr 1016), in fish from the Atlantic Ocean has been associated with adverse reproductive effects in some fish species. This may partly be explained by the presence of two Ah receptor (AhR)-agonistic PCB congeners, 3-methylcholanthrene (3-MC) and PCB 118. A female-specific cytochrome P450 (CYP) 1A enzyme has been identified in fish and amphibians. The aim of this study was to investigate whether 3-MC and PCB 118 affect the oestradiol-17 α (E2) biosynthesis pathway and to assess the effects of these contaminants on the activity of the enzyme, cytochrome P450 1A (CYP1A). Oestradiol was measured in the plasma of fish exposed to 3-MC or PCB 118 by radioimmunoassay. Gene expression was also studied in the liver. In vitro incubation of E2-producing livers with 3-MC significantly increased its production, as did exposure to PCB 118. The expression of cyp1a was up-regulated in the liver of fish exposed to either PCB 118 or 3-MC. The addition of Aroclor 1016 to cell cultures induced the expression of cyp1a. Our results suggest that the oestradiol biosynthesis pathway is activated in the liver of fish by 3-MC or PCB 118. Both chemicals can induce the expression of cyp1a. The induction of cyp1a suggests that PCBs and the AhR agonistic chemicals may have similar toxic effects in fish.
