Resolved Summary: Conflict … A programmer in Insite has told me that he is having difficulty resolving a conflict about his work. He has been working on a number of projects over the past few years, none of which are particularly complicated. He, in particular, has been working on an advertisement placement program that allows users to place a small advertisement on their own website, allowing webmasters to advertise their own websites and websites of interest, (for example, offering a service or product) within the header of another's website. Insite is not difficult to use; anybody could learn how to use it in a fairly short time. If someone wanted to place a message on a website, they would enter a keyword into this program, specifying the date and time that the message appears on the website, and also the message that they want to place on their own website. When the program executes, it goes to the correct website. The webmaster then creates a cookie which gives them, say, a 20 day, 3 inch by 240 column message which is shown on the website. User X, looking at the webmaster's website which has one of these websites logged in, clicks on the advertisement, and the correct, official website displays. The webmaster reseeds the advertisement and stores a list of a number of keywords which they want to be able to place on a third party websites. He later logs on to his program, and looks to see if any of the keywords has occurred on the site. One of the web sites that appears on the list has information that he wants to see if he remembers seeing there before. He therefore clicks on that web site and, using his program, he sees that the web site was on the list, and he remembers that they had similar information there before. So, he goes to the correct web site and, instead of entering the basic information, he enters the keyword that he remembers being there previously. This uses more space, but surely that is justified when the important message for the service has been displayed so many times? Now, this bit of information works very well for this user: he enter the information he wants and he can go to the correct place. However, other users, clicking on this page through link someone else has entered,
