... And one more thing. In this book there is a small episode in which I describe how a large man in a black coat appears from around the corner of the house. He looks at me, I look at him, that's all. Like so. But a second before this meeting, he says: "But I know you." And this is probably the most annoying thing. This means that he knows me, but I do not know him, and he will not tell me anything about himself. He says, "You know, I know you, but you don't know me." And there is nothing wrong with that. You don't know me, I don't know you. And that's it.
