Viewers was an app with a simple concept – play all the video you can find on the internet for free. Its newest release came with a startling new addition – a player. It offers a simple interface and allows you to search online for videos. Some videos can be played directly from the website directly, while others must be uploaded to Viewers. If you find a video you like, you can save it to your library, and view it whenever you want. What it lacks in features (other than its player) is its support for international language packs. No longer do you have to sit there watching your favorite YouTube videos in the background. You can now enjoy them at your convenience. XBMC provides all of the features you're used to from a traditional media center, with the additional bonus of allowing you to watch videos from the internet. A large number of YouTube videos can be easily embedded, as well as user generated content such as from Viddler. XBMC can play back live internet TV channels. XBMC can even play back recorded TV series. The History channel has its own app for Apple TV (not a streaming player), Google Chromecast and Roku that streams content from the History app on the apps for iPhone, iPad, Android and Windows phones. Roku's streaming media player helps make your life easier. You can get lots of channels from all the major streaming services, plus bonus channels for free. And Roku claims its software is super-easy to use, even without prior programming experience.
