You can never have enough of these. It's time to set a healthy, realistic calorie budget for yourself. Although you might find this easier to keep track of in the long run, there are no hard and fast rules about daily calorie intake. We recommend using whatever works best for you, but you need to be consistent so that you get results. The basics. For example, the USDA and American Dietetic Association recommend a 2,000 calorie diet for most adults. This means you should eat 2,000 calories per day. Most people eat well below that, and so the number just represents how many calories you should be consuming each day. The other part is to make sure you're keeping track of everything you eat. If you're already following a calorie budget, go ahead and add 2,000 to that. They're not a magic number, but they can help you get an idea of where you are. If you're not already tracking everything, do it! Over the course of the week or month, you'll be able to see where you need to tweak your calorie budget. The easiest way to track is with a fitness tracker or calorie-counting app. The app or tracker will keep an accurate count of what you eat, and how many calories you're consuming every day. Most people find that they don't use this much, but if you need help tracking your calories, we've got you covered. Another calorie-counting tool is MyFitnessPal. They've recently rolled out a new feature called Count Your Calories, which allows users to track their food and exercise from your mobile device. A quick way to get a feel for how many calories you're eating and how much exercise you're doing is to use the app's trending menus. From there, it's easy to see how many calories you should be consuming each day. They also track your progress when you complete a food or exercise challenge. You can see how much progress you've made on each goal from that. And you can also see your goals, and stay motivated by comparing
