Adobe's Dynamic Linking feature is one of the best features of the new Photoshop CC. Dynamic Linking enables you to use high-quality tools and try out new free Adobe-created content without tinkering with your photos. For example, you can simply try out Adobe's collection of high-quality brushes. This ensures that you're only using applications that you personally trust. If you don't like using them, simply delete the Dynamic Link altogether. Photo editing software being dynamic can make the editing process simpler because the software has less of a learning curve. In the world of Photoshop and PhotoShop, such a feature likely made Photoshop a long-term winner. While I've only been using this tool for some time, I'd say it represents the most open interface I've seen for Photoshop editing thus far. It's also a much faster, more powerful application than the typical Photoshop interface. Using the application in a web browser presents no real problems, which is a good thing considering the massive amount of Photoshop editing and design that goes on in the cloud. Photoshop runs pretty smoothly, but it doesn't have quite the speed of the more robust tools from the likes of Corel (see review) and Freelance Creative (see review). The final tool, PSD Eye, works quite well. It delivers good image quality and is the tool for quick edits and fixing up errors. I don't find it to be quite as adept as PS tools for designing creative projects. The Smart Tool and Smart Brush set in Photoshop CC is pretty nifty, as well, until you start using all of them.
